University Magazine, will remind the reader of the last scene in Buonany's "Pilgrim's Progress"—Time is a river deep and wide,
And life is like a boat that stray,
We see our loved ones o'er its tide,
Sail from our sight away, away
Where are they going?—they return
No more to glad our longing eyes;
They've passed from Life's contracted bourne
To land unseen, unknown, that lies Beyond.

'Tis hid from view; but we may guess
How beautiful that realm must be:
For gleamings of its loveliness,
In visions granted to the seer,
The very clouds that o'er it throw
Their veil, unraised for mortal sight.
We could not gaze on things so fair,
Reflected from the glorious light.
Beyond the river!

And gentle airs, so sweet, so calm,
So soothing to the senses here,
The mourner feels their breath of bliss,
And soothe sad sorrow dies the tear.
And sometimes, too, some angel face
Fleeting sound thus hither folds:
The echo of a distant strain
Of harps' and voices' blended notes,
From the ether!
There are our loved ones in their rest;
They've crossed time's river—now no more
They heed the troubled times of earth,
The storm that rages round us here.

This Magazine, which was first published last season in Buoyant's "Pilgrim's Progress," is a rare gem of literature. It is a river deep and wide, and its waters flow like a stream of life. We see our loved ones o'er its tide, Sail from our sight away, away! Where are they? Oh, where are they? No more to glad our longing eyes, They've passed from Life's contracted hours To land unseen, unknown, that lies Beyond the veil of death.

'Tis hid from view; but we may guess How beautiful that realm must be! For gleamings of its loveliness, In visions granted to the seer, The very clouds that o'er it throw Their veils, unraised for mortal sight. We would peer through their folds, And reflect from the glorious light.

Beyond the river
And gentle airs, so sweet, so calm;
So soothing, so pure, so fresh, so free,
The mourner feels their breath of bliss,
And soothe sorrow dies the tear.
And sometimes, too, we hear the sound
Of harp and voices' blended notes,
The echo of a distant strain
That comes from the other shore!

There are our loved ones in their rest;
They've crossed time's river—now no more
They heed the battles of the world,
Nor the storms that sweep us here.

University Magazine, will remind the reader of the last scene in Buonany's "Pilgrim's Progress" — Time is a river deep and wide,
And every mortal must therein stray,
We see our loved ones o'er its tide,
Sail from our sight away, away,
Where are they sped, and where they rest?
No more to glad our longing eyes,
They've passed from Life's contracted bourne
To land unseen, unknown, that lies
Beyond the veil.
'Tis hid from view; but we may guess
How beautiful that realm must be;
For gleamings of its loveliness,
In visions granted to the just,
The very clouds that o'er it throw
Their veil, unraised for mortal sight.
We would not gaze on things so rare,
Reflected from the glorious light,
Beyond the river.
And gentle airs, so sweet, so calm,
So soothing to the senses, so serene,
The mourner feels their breath of bliss,
And soother sorrow rides the tear.
And sometimes, as we gaze afar,
Fading sounds that neither fosters
The echo of a distant strain
Of harps and voices' blended notes,
Reach to the ear!
There are our loved ones in their rest;
They've crossed time's river—now no more
They heed the troubled times that pass,
The storm that rages and the flood that flows,
The storm that rages and the flood that flows.

mander-in-chief of the British forces in the Crimea brought by the Arago, was scarcely expected on the side of the Atlantic, though the accounts of his intelligence, received by the previous steamer, prevented intelligence awakening emotion of surprise. It does not appear by the London journals that the announcement caused any sensation in England. There had been time to prepare for the event, and his successor was already known. His decease, however, has called forth all the generous feelings of the English nation. The Queen and the Parliament have paid a tribute to his memory, and the people are in the press speak kindly of the old general who died in his country's service. The following is a brief sketch of his life.
Lord Raglan, or as he was better known for some many years, Lord Fitzroy Somerset, was the youngest son of the fifth Duke. He was born in 1788, and was consequently in his 68th year. The Somerses were of the proudest and most ancient blood of Britain; they were of the house of the great Duke of Beaufort, and to travel back to the source of their origin would have as hopeless a task as to penetrate to the fountain of the Nile. Two centuries ago, we are told, the Duke of Somerset was a man who had the highways cleared before him that he might not be looked upon by the vulgar eyes, and who rebuked his second wife for tapping

UNIVERSITY MAGAZINE. This valuable publication, published last scene in Buoyant's "Pilgrim's Progress," is a rare gem. Time is a river deep and wide, And life is but a bubble that strays, We see our loved ones o'er its tide, Sail from our sight away, away, Where are they?—where are they? No more to glad our longing eyes, They've passed from Life's contracted bourne To land unseen, unknown, that lies Beyond the rainbow's arch.
'Tis hid from view; but we may guess How beautiful that realm must be! For gleamings of its loveliness, In visions granted to the seer, The very clouds that o'er it throw Their veil, unraised for mortal sight. Who could peruse the sacred page Deflected from the glorious light, Beyond the river?
And gentle airs, so sweet, so calm, So soothing, so serene, so pure, The mourner feels their breath of bliss, And soothe sad sorrow dies the tear.
And sometimes, too, some angel voice, From some celestial sphere, Echoes forth sweet tidings rather soft, The echo of a distant strain:
Of harps' and voices' blended notes, Of hymns, and songs, and psalms.
There are our loved ones in their rest; They've crossed time's river—now no more They heed the bubbles that rise up, Nor care the storm that sweeps his shore. —THE STONE MASON, NEW-YORK SHORE.

The University Magazine, will remind the reader of the last scene in Buonany's "Pilgrim's Progress".
Time is a river deep and wide,
Which flows along its way, and never strays,
We see our loved ones o'er its tide,
Sail from our sight away, away,
Where are they gone?—they're past us here!
No more to glad our longing eyes,
They've passed from Life's contracted hours
To land unseen, unknown, that lies Beyond the grave.
'Tis hid from view; but we may guess
How beautiful that realm must be:
For gleamings of its loveliness,
In visions granted to the seer,
The very clouds that o'er it throw
Their veil, unraised for mortal sight.
Who could peruse those sacred pages,
Reflected from the glorious light,
Beyond the river?
And gentle airs, so sweet, so calm,
So soothing to the senses, so serene,
The mourner feels their breath of bliss,
And soothe his sorrow dews the tear.
And sometimes, too, some angel voice,
Forth sounding from their faithful folds,
The echo of a distant strain
Of harps' and voices' blended notes,
Reverberates in the ether!
There are our loved ones in their rest;
They've crossed time's river—now no more
They heed the troubled tides that flow,
Nor e'er return to tread its shore.

mandar-in-chief of the British forces in the Crimea brought by the Arago, was scarcely expected on the side of the Atlantic, though the accounts of his intelligence received by the previous steamer, prevented intelligence awakening emotion of surprise. It does not appear by the London journals that the announcement caused any sensation in England. There had been time enough prepared for the fact, as his successor was already known. His decease, however, has called forth all the generous feelings of the English nation. The Queen and the Parliament have paid a tribute to his memory, and the people are in the press speak kindly of the old general who died in his country's service. The following is a brief sketch of his life.
Lord Raglan, or as he was better known for several years, Lord Fitzroy Somerset, was the youngest son of the fifth Duke. He was born in 1788, and was consequently in his 68th year. The Somerses were of the proudest and most ancient blood of Britain; they are of the purest and noblest lineage, and were able to travel back to the source of their origin would have to pass a task as to penetrate to the fountain of the Nile. Two centuries ago," we are told, "the first Duke of Somerset was a man of great stature and fine countenance, whose eyes had the highways cleared before him; that he might not be looked upon by the vulgar as a simpleton, he used to wear a sword and a plumed helmet, and who rebuked his second wife for tapping

Why should Democrats abandon their party—what had happened since they stood together shoulder to shoulder in 1852, and won a Waterloo victory. Had the party or the President been unfaithful to the South or the Constitution? No. Then why desert it? Why desert that party that had given us Texas and Louisiana—Kansas and the Fugitive Slave Law.—That had carried the Country forward to its present exalted position? There still floats the old standard—Democrats fight under it!—liberal men fight under it!

HEALTH OF PORTSMOUTH AND NORFOLK.—There were ten new cases of yellow fever and three deaths in Portsmouth for the 48 hours ending on Sunday morning. The Norfolk News confirms the telegraphic account that the disease has broken out in that city, but says it is not epidemic, and that no trouble or expense will be spared to arrest its progress.
